Water Vision:

The Future of Water Resources in North Carolina

The southeastern United States has been in extreme drought for much of the first decade of the 21st century. The rapid growth of our state means that millions more citizens will need water in the next 20 years. Can our water supply meet this vastly increased demand, given the real possibility of more and deeper droughts?

Citizens are looking to their local leaders for answers. How can elected officials contribute to the resilience and sustainability of their community's water supply? What changes can we make to prepare for water demands in the future?

Join other local leaders from across the state on May 22 to examine these critical issues, share ideas, and gain a "big picture" perspective on water resources in North Carolina and throughout the Southeast.
